Library celebrates 75th anniversary of The Fugitive

In April 1922, a group of Vanderbilt faculty and students published a small poetry magazine that was to spark a renaissance in Southern literature. This year, Vanderbilt is celebrating the 75th anniversary of the publication of The Fugitive with a variety of events. The celebration began last April when the Jean and Alexander Heard Library hosted members of its donor societies at a gala dinner featuring an original dramatization of Fugitive voices written by Marice Wolfe, University archivist. Photos from the dinner may be seen on page 6.

Also in April, a bronze plaque honoring Rose and James Marshall Frank for their contributions to the Fugitive group was dedicated in Special Collections. The plaque was commissioned through the estate of Helen Frank in memory of her parents. The celebration continued in October when Joseph Blotner, author of Robert Penn Warren, A Biography, addressed the 24th annual dinner of the Friends of the Library. Please see page 2 for photographs of the Friends dinner.

During his visit to Vanderbilt, Blotner also took part in the 10th anniversary celebration of the Robert Penn Warren Center for the Humanities.

In addition, an exhibit titled “Seventy-five Years of Fugitive Influence” is on display in Special Collections from now through January. It features recently acquired collections of literary papers that bear on the Fugitive movement, along with manuscripts and artifacts connected with the original group.

Experiencing a noble life

“Writing this book was fun,” Blotner told the ACORN CHRONICLE during a recent interview. “I enjoyed the process very much because I knew Warren, and liked him, and admired his work greatly. I felt very fortunate to be doing it. Red had an intriguing, heroic life, and he was one of the most agreeable, charming, and amusing of men in my experience.

“I also got to meet so many other people whom I liked and admired: Walter and Jane Sullivan, for instance, Lon and Fannie Cheney, and Andrew Lytle.” Blotner read everything that Warren wrote. This was no small feat, for the nation’s first poet laureate penned 16 volumes of poetry, ten novels, a book of short stories, two selections of critical essays, a biography, three his-historical essays, a critical book on Dreiser, a study of Melville, and two studies of race relations in America.

Blotner also consulted books on Tennessee and Kentucky history, politics, and even an edition of Dante’s Divine Comedy printed in medieval Italian and English, “because Red knew it well.”

“It was a continual learning experience,” he says, “This was a process I welcomed of enhancing and enlarging my education.”

One of the more surprising things that his research uncovered was “the vicissitudes of Warren’s undergraduate and graduate careers.”

“He had a tough time sticking to the rules,” Blotner says, “and was something of a disciplinary problem. I knew of his suicide attempt (while a Vanderbilt undergraduate)...and I was distressed and moved to read about his first marriage (to Cinina Brescia), the anguish it caused him, and the nobility that he showed in putting up with it.”

Born and educated in the North, Blotner taught for 15 years at the Universities of Virginia and North Carolina, Chapel Hill. In 1993, he retired as professor of English, emeritus, from the University of Michigan at Ann Arbor, and returned to Charlottesville, Virginia, with his wife, Marnie. There he continues to write about the two giants of Southern and American literature. “Faulkner,” he opines, “is our greatest 20th century novelist, and Warren, our greatest man of letters.”

Blotner also sings the praises of the Jean and Alexander Heard Library.

“It was extremely helpful (in writing Warren’s biography), both the Fugitive collection and Bill Bandy’s Baudelaire library. It was interesting just to walk into the Fugitive Room and see those busts.”

Overall, Blotner views Warren as both an outstanding writer and a fine human being. At the end of his preface to Robert Penn Warren, he pays tribute to Warren’s art and his character:

America’s preeminent man of letters, master of genres, prodigiously creative, heavy with awards and prizes honoring his genius, Robert Penn Warren was also that rare being, a genuinely good man. I am fortunate not only to be able to offer the tribute of a book to his memory, but also to have experienced something of his noble life.
I hope you enjoy the new design, masthead, and name for the library’s publication. We changed the name to the ACORN CHRONICLE to signal a new direction for what was the CHRONICLE. The new masthead combines the color and typeface of the CHRONICLE with the logo for ACORN, our online catalog. We believe that joining the two names and typefaces is emblematic of the duality of modern libraries, which use the new media of light and silicon as well as the age-old media of ink and paper to store the record of human achievement. In addition to making these design changes, we are also expanding the distribution of this publication. Beginning with this issue, the library’s newsletter will report on the activities of the Friends of the Library, the Heard Library Society, and the Heard Library system to a wider audience, including faculty and students.

The “Gallery Talk” inserts are another new feature that will bring you the text of the Sunday afternoon talks we have hosted in Special Collections. We realize that not all of our supporters are able to attend these wonderful events. We hope you will enjoy reading the texts of these lectures. In this issue, Carol Fitzgerald’s “Gallery Talk” imparts her keen interest and excitement in collecting the Rivers of America series. Our next issue will feature the talk given in May by Robert Drake, BA ’52, MA ’53, an author and educator who has donated his papers to our collections. On page 7, you will find a photograph of Drake at a reception honoring him during Reunion ’97 in May.

Since I last wrote to you, the libraries have experienced many exciting developments. We have successfully implemented new software that replaced our ten-year-old library system. While the new catalog still uses the name ACORN, the new system is based on the latest Web technology and allows users to access electronically the full text of selected journals and other information sources by simply clicking on the citation in the catalog. You can read more about it on page 5.

Another recent development is the Nashville Area Library Alliance (NALA), of which we are a founding member. The goal of NALA is to increase access to information resources and library materials for all Nashvillians. Project Athena, the first effort of NALA, will link the catalogs of several Nashville-area academic libraries and the Public Library of Nashville and Davidson County. Please turn to page 4 for more information about the Athena Project.

A development of particular interest to the Vanderbilt campus is a new outreach program for faculty. The library cosponsored a faculty workshop in May on using new technology in the classroom. Based on evaluations received from the participants, the provost has authorized the library to present additional workshops during this academic year. One of the library’s new roles must be to help faculty understand and utilize the new information technology which we bring to campus. Given the rapid pace of change in technological areas, it is impossible for any individual to keep up with all of the new developments. Through these workshops, library staff can help faculty maintain an awareness of the latest technological advances.

Technology is also altering the production of theses and dissertations. In coordination with the Graduate School, we have begun an initiative to offer graduate students the option of writing their dissertations in electronic format. These dissertations will be stored on a library server and will be available over the World Wide Web. Technology now empowers authors to incorporate text, sound, moving images, computer modeling, and data manipulation into their work. The electronic dissertation format allows graduate students new outlets for the creative presentation of their research.

We are energized by all these new projects and directions, but we remain focused as well on core library values of collections, service, and access. As the Heard Library grows and changes, we will depend on the commitment of our staff and our supporters to enable us to keep pace with the needs of our users. I appreciate all of your efforts and encourage you, if you are not already a member, to join the Friends or the Heard Society.

Durham pens history of Tennessee Forty-Niners

Walter T. Durham presented a gallery talk on November 9 on his latest historical study, Volunteer Forty-Niners: Tennesseans and the California Gold Rush, recently published by Vanderbilt University Press. Following his talk, a reception took place in Special Collections. According to the Press, Durham’s book provides the first comprehensive examination of the role Tennessee and Tennesseans played in creating a new state and a new society on the West Coast.

Library gains new development director

Holly McCall was named director of development for the Jean and Alexander Heard Library in October. Her responsibilities also include raising funds for the Vanderbilt Press, the Graduate School, and the Vanderbilt Institute for Public Policy Studies.

Prior to joining the Vanderbilt staff, McCall worked in both the local and national offices of the Cystic Fibrosis Foundation. She has experience in political fundraising, having run several campaigns, and has also worked as a fund-raising consultant.
THE ELECTRONIC AGE OF THE LIBRARY

Athena, goddess of wisdom

Project Athena, a new electronic program linking the Heard Library's catalog with those of other Nashville-area academic and public libraries, is now available for Heard Library patrons and other members of the Nashville community.

"This advance should enable Vanderbilt students, faculty, and other library users to locate needed books quickly and to access them through interlibrary loan," said University Librarian Paul Gherman. It will also enable members of the Nashville community and students in the public schools to take advantage of the research capabilities of the area's academic libraries.

Vanderbilt users can access the Project Athena catalog through the library's home page by clicking on the Athena icons, then choosing "Virtual Catalog," and searching the database following the on-line instructions. A single search of the Athena catalog will tell the user which library holds the item.

Project Athena was officially launched in September by Vanderbilt Chancellor Joe B. Wyatt, Nashville Mayor Phil Bredesen, and Donna Nicely, director of the Public Library of Nashville and Davidson County. The event took place at the Loews Vanderbilt Plaza Hotel during the National Library Power Conference.

"We now have a technology that makes the walls between our electronic catalogs transparent," Chancellor Wyatt said, "so that every student, from preschool to postgraduate, can tap into the awesome arsenal of information in Nashville's libraries."

Project Athena (Accessing Technological Horizons to Educate the Nashville Area) is the first in a series of projects launched by the new Nashville Area Library Alliance (NALA) to support learning through shared library resources. Mayor Bredesen called it "a major step forward for the Nashville library systems and public schools." NALA president Nicely noted, "None of this could have happened without the leadership of Vanderbilt University."

The Heard Library has agreed to host the server to run the SiteSearch software, which allows the search of a number of catalogs simultaneously. "The Virtual Catalog of Project Athena is one of the first applications in the nation of this new software to link various libraries in a community," Gherman said.

Currently, only books can be borrowed through Project Athena. However, Nicely indicated that online publications might also be shared by the libraries in the future. The Athena Virtual Catalog eventually will represent more than 5 million volumes held by NALA members. With 2.3 million volumes, the Heard Library possesses almost 50 percent of the holdings.

All not-for-profit libraries within a 50-mile radius of Nashville are eligible to join NALA. In order to be part of Project Athena, a library must have an electronic catalog that uses a particular software communications standard. In addition to Vanderbilt and the public library, other participants in Project Athena are Belmont, Fisk, Trevecca, Austin Peay State, Middle Tennessee State, and Tennessee State universities.

FRIENDS OF THE JEAN AND ALEXANDER HEARD LIBRARY

JULY 1996 – JUNE 1997

The Jean and Alexander Heard Library is grateful for the generosity of its Friends and other benefactors who provided gifts in the fiscal year (July 1996–June 1997). Contributions included unrestricted donations, for specific areas of the library, memorial and commemorative gifts, documented bequests, and gifts-in-kind.

Library Mission Statement

The library's unique and vital role is to further the University's mission of generating and disseminating knowledge through teaching, learning, research, and service. The library is an essential academic center that serves as a place of discovery, exchange, and advancement of ideas through its commitment to accessing new scholarship and archiving accumulated knowledge.

Staff are dedicated to offering the highest level of service in responding to the information needs of its diverse users and in helping users understand and effectively use new and traditional forms of information delivery.

The first priority of the library is to provide these services to Vanderbilt faculty and students through active outreach across the campus. Secondarily, the library is a resource for the larger academic and scholarly community through its participation in cooperative and collaborative local, regional, and national partnerships.

Statement of Goals

- To support the teaching, research, and service missions of the University by developing strong information resources in book, manuscript, archival, electronic, and other formats.
- To select, organize, and provide broad and timely access to information resources wherever and whenever they are needed.
- To promote the use of Vanderbilt library collections and other information resources by creating an environment that encourages learning through effective teaching strategies and excellent service.
- To preserve library materials and ensure their availability to current and future scholars.
- To develop and maintain appropriate physical and technological infrastructures conducive to learning.
- To recruit, hire, and retain qualified staff who are committed to service, innovation, and communication. Additionally, to foster a supportive staff community that rewards innovation, encourages risk-taking, and accepts failure as a part of growth and exploration.
- To initiate and participate in creative partnerships with local, state, and national agencies that will make accessible to the larger community the unique resources of this library and enhance access by Vanderbilt faculty and students to other information resources.

GALLERY TALK

THE RIVERS OF AMERICA

BY CAROL FITZGERALD

Vanderbilt University • September 15, 1996

An exhibit showcasing all 65 volumes of the Rivers of America series took place from August to October 1996. A reception and gallery talk was held in September 1996 for Carol Fitzgerald, collector and bibliographer of the series, who also served as guest curator of the exhibit.

Good afternoon. It’s a pleasure to be here today in this beautiful room, and to look around at these wonderful books and papers. I must say I have never seen them so gracefully displayed.

This year, as Tennessee celebrates her 200th birthday, we may pause for a moment and think of a then middle-aged lady—a lady of Canadian birth; a journalist, playwright, poet, writer of children’s adventure books; a dreamer—who thought that the history of her adopted homeland, the United States, which she called “America,” ought to be told as a folk saga.

It was the time of the Great Depression—the early 1930s—when millions of Americans were struggling to survive. The lady was Constance Lindsay Skinner, born in 1877 or 1879 (the year is not certain), and she dreamt that the history of America would be told, not as an epic poem, not as a prose chronicle, but through stories of America’s rivers.

She said, “The natural rhythm moving the pioneer life of America forward was the rhythm of flowing water.”

She said, “It is as the story of American rivers that the folk sagas will be told.”

And, she said, these stories would be literary works, to be written by novelists and poets, not historians.

With this elegant idea, Constance Lindsay Skinner set the stage for what is one of America’s most interesting, successful, and enduring literary endeavors, The Rivers of America.
In 1934 Skinner found a publisher for her series, Farrar & Rinehart. With its bright, young, energetic staff, this was the right place—with the right spirit—for a new literary venture. Skinner was named general editor of the series. She had announced that it would encompass 24 volumes.

Kennebec: Cradle of Americans was the first. Written by Robert P. Tristram Coffin, a native of Maine, Kennebec was published on June 14, 1937. And Coffin—a poet, novelist, biographer, historian, essayist, critic, and university professor—was a perfect example of the talent, really the genius, Skinner wanted for the series.

From the beginning, Farrar & Rinehart—then a very young publishing firm—was fully committed to Skinner’s ideas and the high standards she set. They promoted the series with skill and enthusiasm—and so effectively that their promotional campaign itself was the subject of a symposium at a national booksellers convention.

Skinner’s poetic essay “Rivers and American Folk” was put to good use in this campaign. Farrar & Rinehart reprinted it at least twice in pamphlet form, linking it to descriptions of the Rivers titles they were planning. And the essay is included in many of the early Rivers books. Kennebec sold extremely well, going into a second printing in its first year, and very nearly made it onto the best-seller lists in New England.

Skinner had signed some of the nation’s best writers and illustrators, but, sadly, she lived to see only five of the books published. She died in 1939, less than five years after she had begun the series. She was perhaps 60.

In 1940, Stephen Vincent Benét and Carl Carmer—both established and respected literary figures in America—were named series editors. The Wabash, by William E. Wilson, published that year, was the first Benét-Carmer Rivers book. Benét and Carmer maintained Skinner’s literary standards, signing for the series some of the nation’s most accomplished authors and journalists—Hodding Carter (the father, not the son), James Branch Cabell, Edgar Lee Masters, Henry Seidel Canby, and Henry Beston, for example.

Rivers books sold well from the beginning. With the publication of The Kentucky in 1942, Farrar & Rinehart wisely decided to promote the series as a whole, rather than the individual books, urging its readers to collect them all. I’m sure some book-lovers did just that. It was at this time that the publishers issued the Ernest Clegg map of the U.S. as a key part of the series promotion.

Thirteen Rivers books were issued in special signed limited editions. Many of these were promoted regionally. The Brandywine, published in 1941, was written by Henry Seidel Canby and illustrated by the 23-year-old Andrew Wyeth. Canby and Wyeth signed 650 copies for the Greenwood Bookshop in Wilmington, Delaware. (I found mine after a nine-year search.)
Other distinguished illustrators of Rivers books include John Steuart Curry (The Wisconsin, by August Derleth); Ross Santee, author and artist, who illustrated two books in the series: The Gila, by Edwin Corle, and Powder River, by Struthers Burt; A.Y. Jackson, one of Canada’s revered “Group of Seven,” (The St. Lawrence, by Henry Beston); Nicolai Fechin, often described as America’s Old Master, who illustrated Frank Waters’s Colorado; and Lynd Ward, famous for his novels in woodcut, who illustrated Edgar Lee Masters’s Sangenmon.

Tennessee rivers were well represented early in the development of the series. Donald Davidson was selected to write The Tennessee, the only two-volume work in the series, in 1940, only three years after publication of Kennebec. Davidson’s wife, Theresa Sherrr Davidson, illustrated both volumes of The Tennessee. J.S. Sanders & Company of Nashville has recently issued both volumes in its “Southern Classics Series,” with a new introduction by Thomas Daniel Young and a new preface to the second volume by Russell Kirk.

The 1940s were especially important for Rivers books linked to the Tennessee region. The Ohio, Lower Mississippi, Hodding Carter’s first book; The Kentucky, by the noted Kentucky historian Thomas D. Clark; and both volumes of The Tennessee were all products of the 1940s.

The Ohio, by Richard E. Banta, was heavily promoted throughout the Ohio River valley. The governors of Ohio, Kentucky, West Virginia, and Indiana proclaimed October 13, 1949, the day the book was published, “Ohio River Day.” Even the president of the United States, Harry Truman, got into the act, signing a copy of the book which was later co-signed by some 250 others: governors, mayors, city councilmen, and other notables along the way. I would love to know where that copy is!

The French Broad, by Tennessee treasure Wilma Dykeman, was published in 1955. It has been reprinted at least eight times—certainly a tribute to its quality—and is currently available in paperback. One of the last books in the series, The Cumberland, Nashville’s own river, by James P. McCague, was published in 1973, just a year before the series ended.

But the publishers had been thinking about a book on the Cumberland for a long time. Nearly 30 years earlier, in May 1945, John Selby, a Rinehart editor, had written to Hervey Allen, reporting that he had been in Nashville and had met with Judge Byrd Douglas and his wife, Mary Stahlman Douglas. Selby wrote: “Judge Douglas is completely mad on the subject of the Cumberland. His wife is the sister of Jimmy Stahlman who owns the Nashville Banner, and she is literary editor of the paper. She is just as much a Cumberland River fan as her husband and writes very well…”

Later, Selby and Allen agreed that Mrs. Douglas was the right person for the Cumberland book, noting that she might “be able to make up for some of Donald Davidson’s sins of omission around Nashville and other southern towns.”

The first volume of Davidson’s Tennessee had been published some three months earlier. Evidently the publishers were smarting from criticism and poor reviews of Southern origin. But Hervey Allen, who knew good writing when he saw it, after reading Davidson’s manuscript had written that The Tennessee was “not only a Rivers book, but a profoundly impressive job as a contribution to American history.” Why Mrs. Douglas never wrote the book on the Cumberland, I do not know.

I am indebted to the University of Pittsburgh Libraries’ Hervey Allen Collection for this fascinating material on The Cumberland.

When Stephen Vincent Benêt died in 1943, he was only 44. The publishers recruited Hervey Allen as general editor. Allen’s enormously successful novel, Anthony Adverse, had made him a literary star, but—star or not—he took his editorial duties seriously.

A man of prodigious talent and energy, Allen continued to write his successful novels, while editing Rivers manuscripts and creatively promoting the series. He had homes in New York and Florida, travelled between them by train, and managed to care for a very ill wife in the process.

In 1945—with the war over—Rivers authors, illustrators, and editors began to return to civilian life. Wartime paper shortages were eased, and production and publication of Rivers books picked up speed.

When John Farrar returned from overseas service in 1944, he began to distance himself from Farrar & Rinehart—the firm he had cofounded—apparently over personal differences with Stanley and Frederick Rinehart. Before the year’s end, he had left the firm. Late the next year, 1945, he joined with Roger Straus to form the publishing firm Farrar & Straus.

With the creation of Farrar & Straus, the Rineharts finally had a plausible reason to drop John Farrar’s name from their imprint. In December of 1945, ostensibly to avoid confusion of names in the publishing industry, but probably also with relief, they renamed their firm Rinehart and Company and Farrar and Rinehart ceased to exist.

The first Rivers books to bear the new Rinehart imprint and colophon were published in 1946. The Tennessee : The Old River was one of the 1946 Rinehart printings.

As I was preparing these remarks, I realized that 1946 was Tennessee's sesquicentennial year. Fifty years later, Davidson's two volumes on the Tennessee continue to be read and appreciated.

Rivers books were printed under the Rinehart imprint from 1946 until 1960, when Rinehart, Henry Holt and Company, and the John C. Winston Company merged, forming Holt, Rinehart and Winston. The first Rivers title published under their imprint was The Minnesota: Forgotten River, by Evan Jones, the 53rd book in the series, which appeared in 1962. Holt, Rinehart and Winston would see the series through to its completion in 1974.

In the 1940s, four Rivers books were published in Armed Services Editions: The St. Lawrence, Powder River, The Hudson, and The Colorado. These books are included in this exhibit.

In December 1949, Hervey Allen unexpectedly died at his Florida home. He was 60. Following Allen's death, Carl Carmer continued as editor. Carmer and Jean Crawford, who had been named associate editor in 1946, would work together until the series ended with the publication of The American: River of El Dorado, by Margaret Sanborn, in 1974.

From 1937 to 1974, 65 titles were published, and, over those years, all were kept in print. Two books in the series, The James and Upper Mississippi: A Wilderness Saga, were issued in revised editions and are counted as separate volumes. In 1951, four Rivers books were reprinted by the British publisher William Hodge and Company for distribution and sale in Great Britain.

Today, more than one-third of the 65 Rivers books are still in print, mostly through the efforts of University of Vermont and regional presses. But The Rivers of America series will always be seen as the product of Farrar & Rinehart, Rinehart & Company, and Holt, Rinehart and Winston.

Now, a few words about my collection and my book. I began to collect Rivers books about ten years ago. It wasn't long before I realized that there was no bibliography of the series, and no history. In 1991, I began writing to any series author, illustrator, or editor I could find, outlining the bibliography I hoped to write, and asking for relevant information.

I was simply astounded at the responses I received. Some were scholarly, some were funny, all were valuable. I decided that there was a story to tell and history to preserve. Now, five years later, I have finished the bibliographical description of more than 350 editions and printings of Rivers books, written a publishing history of the series, and completed biographical sketches of its 60 authors, 55 illustrators, and perhaps a dozen editors and publishers. My Rivers collection now stands at more than 300 volumes, including nearly every printing of every edition.

Of course, there are still a few gaps. I am hoping soon to have detailed information on the printing run for each of the books—at least for the first editions—and, with luck, to get some detailed information on sales.

The handful of Rivers authors, illustrators, and editors who are still with us have been incredibly kind and helpful and, in fact, my husband Jean and I have formed some good new friendships among them.

I must recognize as well the kindness of Henry Holt and Company in New York. They have been especially generous and helpful with contract and copyright information, opening their files to me without restriction.

My book will be a descriptive bibliography, not a literary analysis of the series or a sociologist's account of the times. But I believe that the publishing history and the biographies of the authors, illustrators, and editors I have included will carry the book well beyond the limits of conventional, technical bibliography. I hope so, because my principal objective has been to record the stories of the men and women who created the series.

My journey to Nashville began nearly ten years ago when I discovered that Dr. Alexander McLeod and I were both collecting Rivers of America books. Soon we began exchanging letters and information, and, as my work on the bibliography progressed, we met and became friends.

It was Alex who suggested an exhibition of my Rivers books. If you have had the good fortune to work with Alex, you know that his "suggestions" have a way of becoming realities. Alex had the vision and Marice Wolfe had the artistic and scholarly talent and ability to bring that vision to life. I hope you will agree: Rivers of America authors, illustrators, editors, and collectors—past and present—would all be proud of this superb exhibit!

From Kennebec : Cradle of Americans to The American : River of El Dorado, from Maine to California, and from 1937 to 1974, Constance Lindsay Skinner's dream has been realized. The Rivers of America series stands as a monument of literary excellence and an enduring story of America, her peoples, and her folkways. It is fitting, I think, that the first and last books in the series, the series shoulders—its bookends—should both have American in their titles, for the series itself is surely American in every possible way.

Library embarks on new electronic odyssey with Sirsi irs. The name conjures up magic in Greek mythology and ancient text. Circe was the enchantress who turned Odysseus’s men to swine.

At Vanderbilt, Sirsi now resides on campus; and while magic is involved, it is not the type Odysseus had to face. Sirsi is the name of the Heard Library’s new automation system. Actually, the name of the company is Sirsi; the product carries the equally magical name Unicorn Library Management System. “But we never really use that,” says Flo Wilson, associate university librarian in charge of systems. “We just refer to it as ACORN, the name of the library’s on-line catalog.”

By any name, it is a system which, for patrons, works with the simple click of a button. The staff, however, knows just how much effort is behind the ease with which patrons find the information they need.

“We had to convert several million records of all kinds,” Wilson says. “While we have some clean-up projects under way to fix problems that occurred, it is pretty incredible to think of translating so many records from one system to another.”

The implementation did not take place without problems, but the company’s response to early difficulties has earned praise from Library administration and systems staff.

“The relatively small number of problems we ran into is good news,” comments Wilson, “but I think it also speaks well of Sirsi’s ability to take the data and do appropriate things with all the information that we had stored over the years in non-standard ways.”

Library patrons now can access information from any computer anywhere that is connected to the World Wide Web—not just from computers located within the library. After accessing ACORN’s home page (at http://acorn.library.vanderbilt.edu), one merely has to click on the appropriate screen icon to begin a search by author, title, keyword, or call number. If the patron needs a different kind of database, such as an index to legal periodicals or government documents, that too can be accessed from the library Web page.

“We hope that having ACORN accessible on the World Wide Web will make it simpler to use because it will be easier to get to in terms of remote access to the system,” Wilson says. “People can use whatever Web browser they have and be able to get to the library catalog in the same way as everything else. Also, at some point we will have all the databases available and probably a larger array of databases through that same environment.”

Wilson notes further perks: “Users also can access their own check-out records with the library and renew their books themselves.”

Electronic journals augment library’s holdings

eard Library patrons who have been unable to get to the library to read their favorite journal lately are in luck. More than 200 journals are now accessible electronically through the library’s Internet Web site. Miss the latest issue of Journal of Buddhist Ethics? No problem. Get that modem humming and access it on-line.

“We subscribe to a number of on-line journals,” says Flo Wilson, associate university librarian. “Many have come into being during the past academic year.”

There are several ways to gain access to the electronic journals, whether on campus, in the library, or off campus via modem. Patrons can go directly to the electronic journals page from the Heard Library home page and obtain a list of available journals either alphabetically or by subject. The subject lists include both full-text electronic journals and home pages for print journals that may feature only tables of contents and, in some cases, abstracts of articles. Or, if you are searching the library’s holdings through ACORN and find a journal reference, that journal may have an electronic version available through a link at the top of the entry.

Not all journals are accessible from off-campus sites, except through University dial-up services. Because of some licensing agreements, certain journals are restricted to Vanderbilt users. In addition to accessing the library’s electronic-journal holdings, the user may also tap into other collections of electronic journals and current news sources through links on the electronic journals Web page.

CORRECTION

In the last issue of the CHRONICLE, we reported that none of the following newspapers was available on-line, when in fact, they have been available on-line for some time, according to William R. Taylor, assistant director for information services at the Walker Management Library. They include the Arkansas Democrat-Gazette, Charlotte Observer, Chattanooga Times, Cleveland Plain-Dealer, Commercial Appeal (Memphis), Dallas Morning News, Houston Chronicle, Knoxville News-Sentinel, Louisville Courier-Journal, Miami Herald, New Orleans Times-Picayune, and St. Louis Post-Dispatch. The Birmingham News is not currently available on-line, but its competitor, the Birmingham Herald, is.

By the end of the academic year, Taylor says these newspapers and other publications will be accessible electronically both on and off campus through the Heard Library’s subscription to the Dow Jones NewsRetrieval service.
Meade Haven hosts historic gathering once more

Benefits of the Jean and Alexander Heard Library celebrated the 75th anniversary of the publication of The Fugitive on April 29 at a festive dinner held at Meade Haven, the former home of Fugitive Jesse E. Wills and scene of the 1956 Fugitive Reunion. The present owners, Ridley and Elizabeth McNamara Wills, Jesse Wills's grandson and his wife, invited the library group to celebrate the historical connection.

About 130 library supporters dined in a tent on the grounds and were entertained by a dramatization of Fugitive voices, circa 1922, selected and given context by Marice Wolfe.

Chancellor James Hampton Kirkland (in the person of John Poindexter) narrated the appearances of all 16 Fugitives, played by members of the English Department faculty, Medical Center faculty, officers of the Heard Library Society and Friends of the Library, and descendants of the Fugitives.

Ellen Wills, the widow of Jesse E. Wills, attended, as did several others who had known the poets in their youth.

Chancellor Joe B. Wyatt, left, read the part of former Fugitive and Harvard political scientist William Yandel Elliott, while Chancellor Emeritus Alexander Heard spoke for Robert Penn Warren.

Special Collections expands holdings of regional folk songs

The library has received a collection of more than 1,200 folk songs and variants gathered in the Middle Tennessee region by George Worley Boswell, BA'39, MA'40, Peabody PhD'51. The papers were a gift of his family.

Boswell's scholarly searching was most intensive during the 1948-52 period, when many Tennesseans with rural backgrounds migrated to Nashville and brought with them the oral tradition of their musical heritage. He transcribed both words and musical notations from the performances of these sources.

This splendid gift was celebrated in June with a reception in Special Collections featuring a gallery talk by folklore scholar Charles K. Wolfe, professor of English at Middle Tennessee State University, who edited Folk Songs of Middle Tennessee: The George Boswell Collection for the University of Tennessee Press in 1997. Wolfe's book comprises the first major collection of Southern folk songs in many years, the first ever of the songs of Middle Tennessee. His talk will be printed as a "Gallery Talk" in an upcoming issue of the ACORN CHRONICLE.

The Boswell materials enlarge and complement valuable holdings in the study of regional folk music already in Special Collections, as contained in the papers of Donald Davidson, Mildred Haun, and George Pullen Jackson.
