The responsibility & duty of the Physician

It is more than probable that but few if any, ever thought seriously on the great responsibility resting upon the man that ~~throws~~<sup>hangs</sup> his banner to the breeze, and offers his services to the people as a Physician, and above all others he should be a man with clean hands and a pure heart, and in every sense of the word a philanthropist.

The Clergy, has the care of souls at heart, but the Physician, in one sense of the word, has both the soul and body of his patient in his hands, consequently he should be a high minded honorable man a man that can sympathize with suffering humanity.

Many contend that the Physician should be a man of a strong nerve, a man that can see his patient suffer, even in the agonies of death, without showing any sympathy for fear of alarming his patient

It is true that the Physician also should have a good nerve, to go forward to discharge his duty in any emergency, but let the opinion of others be what it may, I contend that he should be a man that can feel and sympathize for his patient, and it is not a nug sometimes to let the patient know it

I hope I will be pardon-ed for giving a case that occurred with me in my <sup>late</sup> ~~past~~ several years since Mr A was taken violently ill. The most of his friends had dis-paired of his recovery, he believed himself that he would die, his family Physician which was a very eminent man, the Doctor was not at home, consequently I was sent for, just as I got to the house of the sick man, and stated my self by his bed side the Doctor first sent for road up, and as he was an older Physician than myself, I did not proceed to examine the patient until he came in as I well knew he was the patients choice.

As the Doctor made his appearance in the room, he took his seat by the sick man, and asked him how he was he said to the Doctor that he was very sick and would soon die, the Doctor said to him no indeed what makes you think so, Oh I have such a pain in my breast and side it will

Kill me, the Doctor said what is the matter with you side and breast has a mule kicked you. To be short, the Doctor did not seem to feel any sympathy for the sick man that supposed himself to be almost dead

I saw proper to pursue a different course in my admiration I felt of his palse, I unbuttoned the thick brown coat on his torso, gently placed my hand over his face, stroked his hair back, and placed my hand on his bosom and examined the temperature of his skin, and frankly and honestly told him that I new he suffered much and was very sick but I thought we could prepare some medicine that would have him better in a few days

The Dr and myself agreed on a prescription and as soon as we prepared the medicine, the Doctor left and as soon as he left the room the patient said to me that he would not take the medicine & as I told him why he said that Doctor had no feeling for a sick man and said that there was not much the matter with him Consequently he would not take his medicine but insisted on me to prepare something for him and he would take
believed if there was any chance for him to get well I could cure him, I told him that I felt great delicacy to take the responsibility on my self to change the prescription he insisted that I should. finally I told him that I would do so. I proposed him the medicine differing but little from the former prescription he took the medicine and soon recovered, from that day I have not only been his Family Physician, but the Physician of that neighbourhood generally.

From many years experience in the practice of medicine I have arrived at the conclusion that it is w<sup>r</sup>ght as a general rule for the Physician to be honest with his patient-

I must admit however, that in some instances of obstetrics the Physician should show less sympathy than in other cases as it is calculated to alarm the sufferer ~~and~~ and probably to prolong the labour

It may be necessary in some instances not to let the patient know their situation until all hope is lost of their recovery. Then let the course of others be what it may & I can never reconcile it to my feelings to deceive a patient of mine, and hold out the idea ~~to~~ them that they will get-well and believe at the same time to the contrary

It is frequently the case that Physicians makes and awful blunder when first called to a patient by saying it is a very simple case, and the patient will be well in a few days when probably she has not formed a correct idea of the diagnosis of the disease the patient is actually worse than he supposed and finally dies

Such mistakes is very apt to destroy the reputation of a young Physician, and is not calculated to do much credit to the old and more experienced Practitioner

It is out of the question to make a man that is very sick and suffering acute pain to believe there is not much the matter with him, the Physician had better be honest with his patient and agree with him that he is sick and tell him there is a probability of getting better after taking medicine

Nothing is more absurd than the doctrine advocated by many<sup>that</sup>. There is but little if any responsibility resting on the Physician, and that any person that can give an emetic or purge will do to practice medicine, when in reality he should not only be a man of sense but should understand every branch of his profession well if he does not it will be impossible for him to detect the different type of fevers, and in some instances in all probability will bleed or give an active Cathartie when a tonic is necessary which would destroy the life of his patient.

In our humble opinion the quack from pecuniary motives that would impel himself on an innocent community, to practice without the necessary qualifications, and should destroy the life of an individual sh ould he keep it concealed from the world, and is not a mensable to the laws of his country he will be held respon sible by his God as a murtherer

To speak of the duty of the Physician it is his duty to go and do good, heal the sick, administer to those that need his assistance, watch around the bed side of the sick by day and night as a guardian Angel, show no partiality in attending to professional calls from selfish motives

It is not only his duty to go and administer to the open bust, but also to the poor and absent in the humble cottage

The Physician that will pursue the above course though young and untryed, will soon win a name, a character, and reputation that he may justly be proud of and need never <sup>fear</sup> competition

It is the duty of the Physician to go and see the sick when called on, and to do every thing in his power to relieve their suffering and restore them to health if it <sup>is not</sup> possible for them to get well never give them up until they are dead, but stay with them and when you can do no more wipe the cold sweat from their brow, give them a little water if necessary, comfort them in their expiring moments and when the patient is dead it will be no disadvantage to the Physician if he has a heart that can feel to shed a tear if it is from actual sympathy

It is not only the duty of the Physician to be a student while preparing himself for the practice of medicine but so long as he practices his profession

The Medical Profession is a scientific and honorable profession, and the man that embarks in it should abhor quackery, and determined to become eminent in his profession he should climb the hill of science step by step until he gains the summit and looks over on the other side, then he can turn and look back and gaze up on a world of beauties
